(Make Your Kitchen Your Emergency Room)

Years ago as a young mother, I read that deaths in children occurred more often from accidents than illness.

It was a pivotal moment for me.

Fevers don't kill, I learned, but a head injury could. Chickenpox might be uncomfortable, but it wasn't going to maim my child like a burn or laceration.

I deduced that there are only so many different kinds of dangers, so to learn which remedies to use ought to be something I could readily accomplish.

Besides, I already knew that it was best to leave a fever alone and how easy it is to reduce chickenpox itching with homeopathy. Thus, I pointed myself in the direction of first aid study for the next many months.

How freeing!

I set my mind to studying how to treat lacerations, shock, heatstroke, burns, head injuries, even electrocution, using homeopathy. This allowed me to focus my time on what was most valuable in order to become a more effective parent.

In my efforts to focus on the real dangers to my children, I stumbled across a genuine needle-mover for me.

I discovered the author Dr. Dorothy Shepherd.

While vacationing in Toronto, I visited a century-old homeopathic pharmacy where they sold medicines and homeopathy books. There was a book that caught my eye ... Homoeopathy for the First Aider.

Dr. Shepherd was a conventionally trained doctor who worked in an ER in England during WWI.

However, between WWI and WWII, something changed for her, and she decided to study homeopathy in a local homeopathy medical school. From there on, she shunned the old conventional ways and employed only homeopathic medicines, along with first aid techniques.

In her book, she shares the successes that she never observed with conventional medicine.

My original copy now has softened pages from years of use, but I have a new copy that still has an honored place in my medical library.

Much of what I use today for first-aid is lifted directly from Dr. Shepherd's writings, some of it is from my years of practice, and still more from my own experiences as a mom of three active children.

I've compiled a chart for you that is not only useful to download and place on your refrigerator but as a wonderful home-schooling science tool.
